‘There is in the international relations scholarly community generally, and in the international organization field particularly, a kind of herd instinct ("pack scholarship") at work not unlike the "pack journalism" phenomenon found among newspeople. In academia, this phenomenon often takes the form of the "paradigm shift," where droves of scholars almost in lockstep abandon established intellectual frameworks and accepted truths (e.g., realism) for newer formulations (e.g., modernism), only to return to the original approaches, which, because scholars feel a need to be on the cutting edge of the discipline, are freshly repackaged and relabeled (e.g., neorealism). Or scholars may flit from one island of theory to another (e.g., from regional integration to interdependence to regime formation), in keeping with the latest "fads" that ultimately prove short-lived. We seem to be forever spinning our wheels, or reinventing the wheel, rather than advancing knowledge forward in any steady, cumulative fashion. The seeming inability of the scholarly community to advance knowledge is matched by its seemingly inconsequential impact on the world about which it professes to be expert.’ – Martin J. Rochester

Which is the correct statement?

- The author uncritically applauds the paradigm shifts in the academic field of international organization.
- The author regrets that the scholars in international organization area have failed to learn from the international relations scholars who have added cumulatively to the theoretical understanding of the subject.
- The author is critical about the growing academic fashion to recycle existing knowledge with new jargon and labels in both IR and IO fields.
- The author differentiates the existing trends in academic writings from the field of journalism.
