The leopard in India is struggling for survival. In the last 20 years, the natural forests of India have sharply diminished because of illegal encroachment, and enormous amount of illegal mining and agricultural conversions.

Millions of farm animals graze and degrade leopard habitat across this country and sharply reduce the availability of natural food. Blasted and battered in its natural habitat, the leopard has nowhere to go. Our nation has no vision or bureaucrats have seldom thought or implemented a land use policy that could have kept wildlife safe.

With 1.3 billion people desperate for land and natural resources, the leopard has been cornered. Many patches of remnant forest have little food for the leopard to eat. He is then forced closer to human habitation, starting a vicious cycle of man-leopard conflict.

Around human populations, the leopard, now hungry and desperate, lives on stray dogs and small cattle. In daytime the leopard finds a patch of trees or degraded wasteland to shelter in. It can vanish in such a patch and remain invisible. As the sun sets, It moves towards human settlements encounters man, and if detected , is chased , battered with sticks and stones and badly injured or killed . To escape, it can race into a village hut or someone's house.

Sometimes, a forest team arrives and tranquilises it to take it either to a nearby forest where it is released or to a zoo where it usually dies. Huge errors are made in releasing leopards into forests especially if they are non-killers or man-eaters as in their struggling state they continue to attack man who in their cycle of memory, has become their predator.

"Most of my time is spent in my room, French-plaiting other girls' hair", said Rachel Bufford of the England women's rugby team. Burford and her braided friends then go out in the rugby pitch where, if you have watched any of the recent world cup matches, you have noticed that the women are just as fearless as their male counterparts.

"It has got to the point now when I feel a bit weird if I don't do someone's hair before a game", said Burford. "Some of the girls look really tough with their hair plaited, so it is also a psychological thing – a victorious thing." Sadly victory wasn't tied up in those braids, the team lost to New Zealand in the September 5 final, but many of the players looked fierce like warrior women going into battle.

Plaits are the earliest of hairstyles because before haircutting and hairdressing, people obviously had longhair and plaits were the simplest way of keeping it out of the way, "says a fashion historian." "For that reason", she says, "we associate plaits with both women and men, and particularly these who were involved in athletic pursuits, such as war. Think of Legolas in 'The Lord of the Rings' or the super strong Obelix in the 'Asterix' cartoons. For women, Boudicca or Valkyrie plaits seem to enhance their ferocity", says cox.

It was a practical hairstyle until we get to the 19th century when it began to be associated with female children. Even now, plaits on the whole have the meaning of the youthful schoolgirl. Not an image you will associate with England's victorious rugby team.
