Q.1 Read the passage carefully and answer the questions from:

You and I can help handicapped people by letting them define happiness for themselves. We can make life more miserable for them if we constantly remind them of how terrible we feel because of what they are missing. When we do that we are really saying to them, "Please get rid of your handicap because it makes me so uncomfortable."

Let me illustrate how differently abled people can be happy in their ignorance. Sometimes during a long Iowa winter, I walk to class in the morning and decide, "It's a nice day because I can feel the sun warming my back". Then some sighted person comes along and says, "It's such a dull, depressing day." To him it is dull because the sun is under the clouds. That doesn't really destroy my happiness, and I do need to be aware that other people perceive the world in ways other than I do. I need to recognise that, just as I need to turn on lights in a room for the benefit of others even though I don't need them. So I will continue to be happy about the warm sun while my friend is depressed by the gray clouds. And, on other days, I will be depressed by the cold while he enjoys the bright, but cold, sunshine. We can each find happiness in our own way.

Is this so different from what happens to any of you? You are all missing out on some success or happiness. Your fathers are all disabled in some ways. Some of you are too short to be successful basketball players, and others of you are too scrawny to be professional football players. Do you cry yourselves to sleep every night because of what you are missing? I doubt it.

We can make the life of a differently abled person easy and comfortable by-

1. Sympathising with him
2. Allowing him to define happiness in his own way
3. By making him realise his handicap
4. By reminding him of his flaws

"My shopping addiction began when Flipkart was the major player--way before Amazon came along," he says. "It initially started with ordering books. It then became about finding deals online. When you are earning and have money at your disposal, you are tempted to buy things.

Just like Singh, the convenience of online shopping tempted a lot of us to buy things; things we may not even have needed. Singh says he once spent ₹80,000 in three months. "I bought books, shoes and many other things," he says. "It was a craze, it was also greed." Singh confesses that his tendency to shop was more when he had a bad day.

Bengaluru-based psychotherapist says that compulsive shopping can be a result of pending anxiety disorder. In my experience, compulsive shopping has been seen in people with a traumatic experience. Or those who have insecurities or have faced rejection." Compulsive shopping, according to him, is an extreme symptom of an underlying condition. "The trauma or the rejection could have taken place between the ages of one and 10," he says. "This usually manifests in adolescence. Shopping here can provide the same relief as a painkiller."

The pain or trauma can be anything from parental abstention, abuse (emotional or physical) or even financial or social insecurity, "The presumption that compulsive shopping is predominantly a female problem is wrong," says Joseph. "It can affect men, too." There are also shoppers who buy the product, return it and do this on a loop, he says.

"Getting help is crucial," adds Joseph. "Psychotherapy can help can help identify the underlying problem, find the root cause and help address it. One could also turn to parents or a trusted friend. Tell them about why you shop, how you feel when you shop; talk about it in detail. You could also ask them to keep a check on you - make it so that you need their permission to shop. Or, let them handle your debit/credit cards for a while. This will create a delay and help cut the urge." Joseph also suggests writing down the trigger. Q.11 My companion on the rock was very relieved to see me. My long absence, and the growling he had heard, had convinced him that the tigress had secured another kill, and his difficulty, as he quite frankly admitted, was how he was going to get back to the village alone.

I thought when we were climbing down the watercourse that I knew of no more dangerous proceeding than walking in front of a nervous man carrying a loaded gun, but I changed my opinion when on walking behind him he slipped and fell, and I saw where the muzzle of his gun--a converted .450 without a safety catch--was pointing. Since that day--except when accompanied by Ibbotson--I have made it a hard-and-fast rule to go alone when hunting man-eater, for if one's companion is unarmed it is difficult to protect him; and if he is armed, it is even more difficult to protect oneself.

Arrived at the crest of the hill, where the man had hidden his boots, I sat down to have a smoke and think out my plans for the morrow.

The tigress would finish what was left of the kill during the night, and would to a certainty lie up among the rocks next day.

On the ground she was on. There was very little hope of my being able to stalk her, and if I disturbed her without getting a shot, she would probably leave the locality and I should lose touch with her. A beat therefore was the only thing to do, provided I could raise sufficient men.

I was sitting on the south edge of a great amphitheatre of hills, without a habitation of any kind in sight. A stream entering from the west had fretted its way down, cutting a deep valley right across the amphitheatre. To the east the stream had struck solid rock, and turning north had left the amphitheatre by a narrow gorge.

Which one of the following was the main concern of 'my companion' ? Choose the most appropriate option:-

1. Narrator's long absence
2. How to go back to the village alone
3. The tigress had killed an animal
4. Growling of the tiger

Q.12 My companion on the rock was very relieved to see me. My long absence, and the growling he had heard, had convinced him that the tigress had secured another kill, and his difficulty, as he quite frankly admitted, was how he was going to get back to the village alone.

I thought when we were climbing down the watercourse that I knew of no more dangerous proceeding than walking in front of a nervous man carrying a loaded gun, but I changed my opinion when on walking behind him he slipped and fell, and I saw where the muzzle of his gun--a converted .450 without a safety catch--was pointing. Since that day--except when accompanied by Ibbotson--I have made it a hard-and-fast rule to go alone when hunting man-eater, for if one's companion is unarmed it is difficult to protect him; and if he is armed, it is even more difficult to protect oneself.

Arrived at the crest of the hill, where the man had hidden his boots, I sat down to have a smoke and think out my plans for the morrow.

The tigress would finish what was left of the kill during the night, and would to a certainty lie up among the rocks next day.

On the ground she was on. There was very little hope of my being able to stalk her, and if I disturbed her without getting a shot, she would probably leave the locality and I should lose touch with her. A beat therefore was the only thing to do, provided I could raise sufficient men.

I was sitting on the south edge of a great amphitheatre of hills, without a habitation of any kind in sight. A stream entering from the west had fretted its way down, cutting a deep valley right across the amphitheatre. To the east the stream had struck solid rock, and turning north had left the amphitheatre by a narrow gorge.

Why did the narrator change his opinion about his companion ?

1. He fell down due to his carelessness.
2. He fell down because he could not see.
3. He did not know how to use a gun.
4. He was very nervous.
